Editor’s Notes

The theme of this issue of the Anglican Theological Review is salvation, a topic that co-editors Grant LeMarquand and George Sumner identified and then developed with a group of distinguished evangelical Anglican theologians. We are deeply grateful for their work, and most appreciative of the helpful and thought-provoking ideas and insights they have presented.

Why salvation? LeMarquand and Sumner give an account of the origins of this issue in the first paragraph of their Introduction. This issue is a response of sorts to the Summer 2008 ATR issue “Homosexuality, Ethics, and the Church” (available at http://www.anglicantheologicalreview.org/read/conversations/5/). The present issue does not refute the discussions there, nor does it propose an alternative view, which is at any rate well articulated in the Winter 2011 ATR issue “Same-Sex Relationships and the Nature of Marriage.” Rather, as the Introduction says, the present issue addresses some of the fundamental theology that shapes and is shaped by the considerations and controversies that are often more immediately evident. In short: what Christians have to say about the work of Jesus Christ—salvation—has a great deal to do with what we say about human sexuality, the Christian moral life, the form and content of the liturgy, and so on.

Nor is Christian—or Anglican—belief about salvation uniform and settled for all time. The co-editors’ Introduction sums up some of the pressing questions today: “Is the doctrine of salvation too narrow in this pluralistic age? Have we, in our deeply historicized and supposedly post-metaphysical age, outgrown such claims? And what about the inherent unfairness of substitution, or the offense of offering up for death one’s child?” There are no easy answers to these questions. And even within the particular “parties” one might identify in the current church, significant differences and disagreements exist. Evangelical Anglicans (for example) do not agree on what Paul had in mind relative to justification by faith. This, then, has implications for how one views the Christian moral life, including specific dispositions and behaviors.
The essays in this issue probe some issues and questions that are of fundamental significance to all Christian believers, evangelical and catholic, conservative and liberal. They do so in part by drawing on Scripture, Anglican tradition, and important theological studies that continue to shape theological considerations today. Through this method, they bring in front of us important aspects of our common heritage which must be taken into account as we seek faithfully to spread the Good News in today’s world.

And for those who are not evangelicals, these essays offer an opportunity to broaden understanding of theological method and fundamental commitments and to deepen appreciation for an aspect of the Anglican theological tradition with which many are, unfortunately, unfamiliar.

Most importantly, this issue invites us all to ponder anew what God has done for us in Christ.

Beginning with this issue, the ATR is taking a new approach to the Book Review section. Instead of one Book Review Editor with responsibility for making sure all areas of theological studies are covered, we have eight editors with particular areas for which they are responsible. This brings us greater expertise in selecting what is to be reviewed and by whom, and it increases the likelihood that the range of subjects covered in each issue is as wide as possible. We believe this change will make the book reviews more helpful to all of us as we figure out what to add to our reading lists. The new book review editors and their fields are:

- Walter Hannam, Historical Theology
- Jason Fout, Theology and Ethics
- Jon Nilson, Ecclesiology and Ecumenism
- Richard Leggett, Liturgical Studies
- Kathleen Russell, Pastoral Theology
- Tobias Haller, Religion and Culture
- Sofia Starnes, Poetry

These editors always welcome new reviewers and suggestions on books to be reviewed. So if you want to review books for the ATR, or if you have specific books you think should be reviewed, please contact the relevant editor(s) using the email addresses provided at http://www.anglicantheologicalreview.org/write/book_review_guidelines/. Please remember to check with the editor before writing a review; a review of the book you are interested in may already be in process.

Also in this issue is our donor list from the past year. Gifts from these dioceses, parishes, and individuals quite literally make the journal possible: without them we would not be able to continue. We are deeply grateful to each and all of them.

As important to us as the financial support we receive is the knowledge that, through their giving, our donors are expressing confidence in and support of the journal’s mission: to foster scholarly excellence and thoughtful conversation in and for the church. Their gifts affirm that the people of God can and do benefit from enriched and extended discussion of the Christian faith and its significance in what God is doing in the world.

If you are not already a donor to the ATR, please think about joining these friends and colleagues. Consider giving a subscription to a friend or colleague, or to a seminary or Anglican studies program anywhere in the world. Donations can be made directly from our website (http://www.anglicantheologicalreview.org/support/) as well as by mail or by phone. And thank you for your interest in the Anglican Theological Review.
